Why should you take A Levels?

Research shows that …

- If it's your ambition to go to university, then you should consider taking A levels first. Although many universities do accept other entrance qualifications, the admissions system is geared towards A levels. With A levels you do not have to take foundation courses - you can go straight to your degree.

- A levels are the best way to prepare for university. They are a great introduction to the study habits required by universities because they have been designed as university entrance exams.

- Taking A levels demonstrates your commitment to securing a place at a university.

- Because the A level standard is widely recognised by prestigious institutions around the world, not just the UK, it is a great choice if you want to choose from the widest range of options later on. Many other qualifications have to be topped up, but A Levels generally let you skip that stage and smooth the admissions process.

- Employers love A Levels. While A levels are important for admission to university, they also provide advantages later on. A levels – and their grade levels – are widely recognised by employers around the world. A strong set of A level results, combined with your degree, will help you stand out from other candidates. This is a great way to demonstrate consistent performance and your ability to meet international standards of excellence.
